

Published based on Horse Racing Silks: A Guide to Picking Your Own Racing Colours

Horse Racing Silks: A Guide to Picking Your Own Racing Colours

If you love the sport of horse racing, you've probably at some point dreamt of the time when you might own a racehorse for yourself. Thoroughbred horse racing has always been referred to as a sport of kings and having the ability to own a racehorse could give you with the opportunity to experience this long established sport, steeped in tradition and pride. If you choose to buy a racehorse you will need to pick the jockey silks which will symbolize you or your syndicate. The next few paragraphs provides an insight into racing colours.

Throughout past years of horse racing, the horses have traditionally belonged to affluent people. In the last few years, however, it's become quite popular for racing horses to be joint owned in partnerships or other types of syndicates. One notable example of this fact is the 2003 Kentucky Derby winner, Funny Cide, a racehorse owned by a number of at least 10 partners who joined together and organized themselves as Sackatoga Stable. A different example is 2008 Kentucky Derby winner, Big Brown, who was owned by IEAH Stables, a horse racing hedge fund organization of sorts.

If you have arrived at the conclusion you want to have a racehorse, there are several points to consider. Probably the most individual choices to make when opting to own a racehorse, is picking out your colors, or "silks". Every horse races in the distinctive colors of their owner or partnership, and there's no two horses running in the same colors. This allows race goers to easily identify the horses and who they are owner by. The person who owns the horse must register the colours with the country's ruling organisation, which in that instance the UK is the British Horseracing Authority.

Some styles of silks are so well-liked that race horse owners are willing to pay out a small fortune for them. A number of silks have actually sold for significant amounts, or even tens of thousands of pounds. Silks which are regarded as very unique, or may possess a lengthy and dramatic past are known as "cherished colours" and so are usually the priciest, as so frequently are the "plain silks," the ones made up simply of a single colour.

Once you establish that you would like to own a racing horse, you'll have many important selections to make, for example where to locate a trainer as well as many, many other things. Perhaps starting off with deciding upon your own colors might possibly be the easiest method to get excited about the great sport of horse racing and owning a race horse.

Have you considered racing partnerships as a way of becoming a racehorse owner? This type of racehorse ownership enables you to own a share of a racehorse with the added benefit that the cost of the horse's upkeep is split amongst all the members.

You can also find this article published on Horse Racing Silks: A Guide to Picking Your Own Racing Colours, and on the tag pages Horse Racing, own a racehorse, plain silks, racehorse partnerships, racing colours, silks, sport of kings, syndicates.